An Uncholcome Practice of Suring.

An Uncholcome Practice of Suring.

We have frequently noticed matrix you suddenly start up a lot of bogs and pigs that are lying piled up together, there will many times be three or four small ones, and perhaps more, that at first seem to be perfectly helpless and senseless, as if dead or in a faining fit. The steam and animal heat that generates is so weakening and stilling that, for a time, it takes all strength away from them. Hogs so kept together are always more or less diseased. When they get up out of such a bed and go in the cool air, even the morning air of our summers, they are most once more processor, diseased.

Another step In Advance that most sure to take cold, and after the most sure to take cold, and after the cold come more permanent deesses, like asthma and quinty. At first you will notice the smaller ones coughing or making a noise half a cough half a neers. Then you will in a few days, if you look closely, see that their eyes begin to appear sore, and to be watery like the eyes of a person with a catarrhal cold. Then the sides of the pig will begin to show a mangy of sourry appearance, and this appearance will gradually spread over the whole body, and the subject will be all away in flesh, lose its appeaite and finally die. More pigs probably die from diseases generated in the manner we have described than from any other cause. The time of the greatest morthality from these causes is when they are about air weeks to two months old, or about the age, it is more than likely they will all sleep in one bett, piled up from three to four deep. There is no other age when pigs are more delicate and inclined to take disease than this. They feel then the loss of the nourishment they have been receiving from their mothers and should have the best of care and the all the age, it is more than likely they will all sleep in one bett, piled up from three to four deep. self up out of the corner of the stall, under such circumstances is a saint. The strain on a man's inner right courses in that moment is immense. We are positive about it, for we have been there, and know how it is ourselves.

Farmers and Beez.—Everything in bee keeping deen not depend on location. The manner in which many farmers keep their bees, almost forces one to conclude that they are either too indolent or ignorant to keep there a successfully, and that in reality they should not make the attempt. I will enumerate the kind of farmers who can keep bees, at least enough to supply themselves with honey sufficient for the wants of their own families. The farmer who has sufficient sense to plant corn at the right time, and energy to eradicate the weeds and stir the coll to insure a good crop, can keep bees. The man that adorns his home with shrubs and flowers, raises delicious fruits for his table, and desires the sense of the content of the strain of his children in every useful art that agriculture and home affords, will keep them. On the other hand the one who has not time interest or energy to do all these things need not expect to get either.

Samloza, 13.—General Prochaska and his gent have been charged with obtaining 120,000 francs, and the promise of $0.000 francs, and the promise of $0.000 francs, and the promise of $0.000 francs, and $0.000 francs to his agent, and $0.000 francs since the weeds and stir the coil to insure a good crop, can keep bees. The man that adorns his home with shrubs and flowers, raises delicious fulls for his table, and desires the education of his children in every useful art that agriculture and home affords, will keep them. On the other hand the one who has not time interest or energy to do all those things need not expect to get either.

other hand the one who has not the interest or energy to do all these things need not expect to get either money or honey from bee culture, some of the requisites to care, even for a few stocks of bees, are, first—A love for the bees. No one succeeds well who keeps bees with only large profits in view, for in this bosiness "he who maketh haste to be rich," will surely fall into a snare. Second, knowledge and energy to do the right thing at the right time. This can be attained by reading and observation, and time and money thus expended will prove a good investment. Third, faith that bees will pay if rightly kept. A like faith is necessary in this vocation as that which the larmer exercises in all his farm matters.—G. W. Neihardt, in the Bee Keeper's Guide.
